Oregon’s Apple Legacy

Why Oregon Is a Fruit Powerhouse

Oregon is home to more than 200,000 acres of apple orchards, producing over 2 million bushels each year. The state’s mild climate, rich volcanic soil, and careful water management create the ideal conditions for apples of all varieties—Fuji, Gala, and the beloved McIntosh. The harvest season, which peaks in late summer, is a time of bustling activity, from the first blush of green to the final, sweet bite.

The Role of Small Farmers

While large corporate growers dominate the headlines, it’s the small family farms that often produce the most flavorful apples. These farmers maintain traditional practices, such as hand-picking and natural pest control, ensuring that each apple carries the unique terroir of its orchard. Their dedication is what feeds the culinary and literary markets alike.
